RETURED NAVAL OFFICER WITH CIVIL WAR RECORD

Rear Admiral O'Neil Was Master's Mate Aboard Sloop Cumberland, Sunk by Merrimac.

There is one member of the crew of the sloop Cumberland, which was sunk by the Confederate ironclad Merrimae March 8, 1862, who is still carried on the rolls of the navy. That man is Rear Admiral Charles O'Neil, retired, who was then a master's mate. He was born in Manchester, England, March 15, 1842, and came to this country when five years old. In July, 1861, joined the Cumberland and that vessel when she went down. Lieut, George U. Norris was the executive officer of the Cumberland and was in command of the vessel in the engagement, in the absence of Capt. William Radford, who was attending a court

Radford, who was attending a court of inquiry ashore.

When summoned to surrender by the Merrimac, Lieut. Morris replied: "Never! I'll sink alongside!"

As the Cumberland approached the water's edge, Lieut. Morris and the gallant crew stood firm at their posts and delivered a parting fire and the ship went down with her colors flying. Many of the officers and men were able to reach the shore, but a large number perished with the vessel. Lieut. Morris would have been drowned but for Mate O'Neil. For his gallant services on that occasion he was promoted to acting master May 1, 1862.
